The subject of the study - socio-cultural forms of adaptation of adolescents with deviant behavior in public organization "Youth and sports club Haran".

The theoretical significance of this work lies in the accumulation of theoretical approaches to the object of study.

Practical significance of qualification work is that theoretical understanding of the nature and structure of deviations in behavior of the teenager allows, on a practical level to solve the problem of selection of forms, methods and means adequate theoretically grounded and experimentally tested model of the process of social adaptation of deviant teenagers. The process of prevention of deviant behavior of teenagers, creating conditions for socialization and self-actualization is realized and developed through the complex socio-cultural events.

Main results: the theoretical analysis showed that the main target of preventive work in the system of offences in the teenage environment is the prevention of social maladjustment and adjustment of social deviations that are a consequence of unfavourable social development caused by various factors of environment, upbringing and physiological features.

The process of adaptation of deviant teenagers should be implemented purposefully in the collaborative work of psychologists, educators, social workers and children on the basis of subject-subjective relations.

We found that cultural-leisure activity is one of the most important means of optimization of socio-cultural human environment. The process of functioning of leisure activities can be represented as the interaction of two trends: socialization and individualization. Organizational forms of work with adolescents must be directed to the development of their cognitive interests and abilities. It is important to note that the juvenile period of development is characterized by substantial changes in all aspects of the individual – psyche, physiology, relationships, and subjective when a teenager enters into a relationship with the adult world. Therefore, only the differentiated approach in the selection of certain forms to ensure their effectiveness.

The practical significance of final qualifying work is that the theoretical understanding of the nature and structure of the deviations in the behavior of the teenager on a practical level allows to solve the problem of the selection of forms, methods and means of adequate theoretically grounded and experimentally tested a model of the process of social adaptation of deviant adolescents. The process of prevention of deviant behavior among adolescents, creating conditions for socialization and self-actualization, realized through developed complex socio-cultural activities.

Main results: The theoretical analysis showed that the main purpose of the preventive work in the system of offenses among teenagers is to prevent social exclusion and correction of social deviations, which are a consequence of adverse social development caused by various environmental factors, education and psycho-physiological characteristics.

The process of adaptation of deviant adolescents should be carried out specifically in the joint activities of psychologists, educators, social workers and children on the basis of subject-subjective relations.

We found out that the cultural and leisure activities is one of the most important means of optimizing the social and cultural human environment. The functioning process of leisure activities can be viewed as the interaction of two trends: the socialization and individualization. The organizational forms of work with adolescents should be directed to the development of their cognitive interests and abilities. It is important to note that the period of adolescence is characterized by significant changes in all aspects of the personality - the psyche, physiology, relationships, when a teenager subjective enters into a relationship with the adult world. Therefore, only a differentiated approach in the choice of one or another form can ensure the effectiveness of their impacts.
