For the preservation of social stability, the successful development of Russian society and the state, the socio-political activation of youth, based on citizenship and encouraging young people to contribute to the life of the country, takes on particular importance. ### Results.

A study of the social factors of youth activity showed that the barriers to increasing social activity are both factors that are weakly dependent on social conditions and factors that are under the control of the structures responsible for the implementation of youth policy. The analysis of the results of various studies and state programs for the implementation of youth policy revealed the inconsistency of most areas of implementation of youth programs among the subject and object of management and the predominance of a process approach in the implementation of programs. Various forms of development of social and political activity of young people are considered.

Recommendations.

Based on the studies, a structural model of the social program for activating youth was proposed. A number of conditions were highlighted that ensure the process of interaction between the subject and the object of social programs to increase youth activity. The main elements of the social program for the activation of youth are highlighted. An algorithm of a social program for activating youth has been defined, which can find a practical embodiment in the implementation of state youth policy at the federal, regional and local levels. In addition, ways have been identified to improve the forms of development of social and political activity of young people based on the interaction of state authorities and civil society institutions.
